Rollators may differ in the characteristics that they come equipped with. Medical requirements can be consulted here. Most of the standard rollers are designed to support at 250 pounds, but other products have been tested and approved to up to 500 pounds. In order for Medicare to cover your new roller walker, there are some requirements that must be met first. For example, some include soft, large and grippy wheels that are ideal for indoor use and can protect your floors. What is a Rollator? The space also considered, with some rollers being able to fold to minimize storage needs, while others do not collapse and are built for durability. Other models use harder and more durable wheels that allow better traction on land, gravel and other surfaces. As long as you meet the requirements, Medicare will pay 80% of the cost of your walker. Each of these equipment models can be used in different circumstances depending on the specific needs of the patient. After their determination, they will provide you with a prescription for a rollator, which will allow you to qualify for coverage through yours of your insurance plan. Medicare Coverage for Rollators Medicare insurance provides coverage for rollators in most cases. The equipment model (DME) is covered by Part B of Medicare (Mother Insurance) (dico), which helps to cover the costs of services and hand supplies care received in an outpatient environment. Being caught between a tight budget and health concerns is something that millions of Americans deal with on a monthly basis. That raises an important question.
